Between the hours of (                      ) (                      ) and (                      ) (                      ).

Now you notice the walls here in this section of the freeway. The reason, of course, they put the walls up is for sound barriers. And I tell you, it works really well. If you, uh, if you're on the other side of that wall, it's very quiet, believe it or not. Now the people living directly across up in these hills have a different story to tell you. They will tell you it was nice and peaceful and quiet up in those hills until some jerk built a wall around here, and now all that noise bounces off the wall and heads up into the canyon and up into the hills. And so now they get to listen to the, the music.

On the left here, we have a big, big shopping center called Terra Linda. Uh, it belonged to the Freitas Brothers Dairy. They milked over a thousand cows here. But they were too close to the freeway and the taxes back in those days of about 1955, 56, the property taxes versus the milk price was terrible. Anyway, they got taxed out of business. And they knocked over everything. I mean, there's no farmhouse, no, not the old family home. No barns. No nothing. They knocked everything over.

Now look to the left, above this, this beige-colored building, and you notice it's all bare. It's basic---it looks like wilderness up there. And then look straight ahead a little bit to the left, you see another hill. It doesn't have anything on it. It doesn't have any homes. It doesn't have any cows. It doesn't have anything. These two chunks of land are part of what is called the Marin County Open Space District. And they're, they're kind of like parks, they're preserved as open space, which means you can walk around in there between the hours of sun up and sun down. But you can't bring your dog. You can't picnic. You can't stay overnight. You can't camp. You can't bring your bike and bring your car. Um, you probably can't have sex in that place either. But you can walk around there between the hours of sun up and sun down. Look to your right....
